Skaggs chain, Dr. Bardsley announced he would build a new two-story brick building, and John Rugar became manager of the American Theatre. It wasn't long until Rugar headed a group that raised $50,000 to build the fine new Egyptian Theatre on the site where the old Dewey Theatre had been. It was built of brick, seated 450 people, and opened on Christmas Day, 1926. The Daisy Stage was housed in a new brick building also, just across the street from the New Park Hotel.

"Old Grover," the Chinese, died at Park City in March, 1926. For over 30 years he had been a friendly and familiar figure in Park City. Few Park City residents knew his real name was Quom Nom Low or that he signed his name Quom Nom Low de Grover. He had a wife living in China, who had never been in America, and a son known as Joe Grover. For the next 30 years Joe Grover would be just as well liked, and familiar a figure as "Old Grover" had been.

Another death in March, 1926, caused considerably more excitement than the death of "Old Grover."

On March 12, while waiting to start shift at the Judge Tunnel, a miner named Herbert Crouse became involved in an argument with a Mexican miner named Pantoi. A few names were called, blows were exchanged, and then to horror of the watching miners Pantoi suddenly pulled a knife and stabbed Crouse three times in the chest. He died in front of his friends and only the arrival of a lynching. Miners at the Judge mine unless all the Mexicans were immediately.

George Kruger refused the miner's offer to walk off the job and returned to the mine to appear imminent. City officials sent men to prevent trouble and county men from the American Legion patrolled the mine order. The following Sunday the Miners at the Judge Mine refused to enter the mine unless all the Mexicans employed there were fired immediately.

Mine superintendent George Kruger refused the miner's ultimatum and the men walked off the job and returned to town making mob action appear imminent. City officials closed all public places to prevent trouble and county officers and deputies from the American Legion patrolled the streets to maintain order. The following Sunday the
